1 See Hdt. 1.30-33. Solon visited Croesus, king of Lydia, and was shown all his treasures, but refused to call him the happiest of mankind until he should have heard that he had ended his life without misfortune; he bade him 'mark the end of every matter, how it should turn out.'. 2 i.e., if our estimate of his life as happy or the reverse had to change.

SparkNotes: Nicomachean Ethics: Book I

Aristotle begins his study on ethics by asserting that there is some ultimate good which is both complete and self-sufficient, and defines this good as happiness. There must be one final end of all human actions, because a human action by definition is one that is done on purpose and for a definite goal.
