The solution here is something called automatic gain control, abbreviated AGC. We can intuitively conclude that there really is no way to achieve this in an open-loop system—the amplifier circuitry must have knowledge of the output amplitude in order to properly adjust the gain. It follows, then, that AGC requires feedback.

Automatic programming - Wikipedia
“Feedforward” is a rather under-used control strategy capable of managing a great many types of process problems. It is based on the principle of preemptive load counter-action: that if all significant loads on a process variable are monitored, and their effects on that process variable are well-understood, a control system programmed to take appropriate action based on load changes will ...
