The second group was given the exact same choice, but it was framed in terms of lives lost instead of in terms of lives gained: The certain option meant 400 people would die for sure: the risky treatment meant a 1/3 chance no one would die and a 2/3 chance all 600 would die.

Making Life-Changing Decisions | Psychology Today
The issue of how we make choices and decisions is far from a new one. The concept of free will - the ability to decide freely - is an important topic for theologians, who view it as key to being able to distinguish between 'good' and 'evil' - demonstrated literally in Adam and Eve's choice making in the Garden of Eden.
