Ivory Tower Blues has garnered a good deal of media attention since it was published earlier this year, perhaps because the media always loves a good "crisis." In a nutshell, the authors believe that systemic problems are undermining Canada's universities, arising over the past few decades from a complex interplay of government funding cuts, tuition increases, increasing PSE participation rates, growing class sizes, high school grade inflation, and a labour market glut.

Ivory Tower Blues: A University System in Crisis

The ivory tower is most often connected to the career and lifestyle of academics in university and college systems. They have often garnered reputations as elite institutions by joining or creating associations with other universities. In many countries, these institutions aligned themselves with a specific mission or athletic ties.

Ivory tower - Wikipedia

Throughout Ivory Tower Blues, Côté and Allahar provide readers with examples of how structures of the North American academic "meritocracy" and our current consumerist, "feel-good" society have created conditions in which faculty's expectations of teaching and learning are incompatible with those of their students. The millennial students they describe, raised in a climate of entitlement, expect to slide through university as they had done in high school and are incensed by what they ...
