Another form of data collection that has been used extensively in mental health services research is the focus group. Focus groups are interviews that are designed to use group interaction to generate data and insights less accessible in individual interviews (Krueger, 1988; Morgan, 1988). Although this cannot always be achieved in service settings, the ideal composition of a focus group is between 6 and 10 "homogeneous strangers," individuals who are similar by virtue of their ...
