In "My Last Duchess," the dramatic monologue is directed at a courtier of a wealthy count, presumably one whose daughter the Duke is trying to marry. Before the poem even begins, the courtier has been escorted through the Duke's palace—probably through an art gallery filled with paintings and sculptures.

Robert Browning's Poetry: "My Last Duchess" | SparkNotes

My goodness there are some epic poems in the AQA GCSE English Literature poetry anthology section on Power and Conflict. From the pithy treatise on humanity in Ozymandias to the quasi-Biblical woe-begotten tale of London and then Stealing The Boat from the Romantic epic-to-beat-all-epics in Wordsworth's The Prelude... now we come to a portrait of megalomania personified in My Last Duchess by ...

My Last Duchess - Wikipedia

This 'faltering' voice so evidenced in Hardy's poem is of course nowhere evident in Browning's 'My Last Duchess.' The wonderfully orchestrated build up to the disclosure of the murder of the Duchess reinforces Adam Phillips' point that 'the words of the mad are more prosperous than the words of the sane.'

Last week, I looked at the context behind My Last Duchess, as it's such an interesting background to the poem. Although based on historical characters, Browning's selection of the character and time period is interesting in itself. I think it represents a real shift from the Romanticism of the earlier poems in the new AQA...
