Momaday describes the landscape of Rainy Mountain, which is a knoll (hill) in the Oklahoma plains where the Kiowas have lived for a long time. The weather here is harsh, but Momaday's evocative description of the landscape draws out its beauty. He notes that it's a lonely landscape—there are not many objects, simply one tree, one hill, or one person.

The rain symbolism is not entirely a literary conceit, either, as rain actually precedes an outbreak of fatal illness, the cholera that kills seven thousand that fall. Later, during their Milan idyll, Catherine makes the symbolism of the rain explicit for Henry — and for the reader: "I'm afraid of the rain because sometimes I see myself dead in it," she says to him.
