The Ring of Gyges [QP] Plato differed from most philosophers in that he did not underestimate the ability of allegories and examples in conveying points to a reader. In the Republic, one of his most famous dialogues that explores epistemology, metaphysics and ethics, one of the interlocutors (Plato's brother Glaucon), brings up the famous myth of Gyges by Herodotus.

To help them consider this question, Glaucon explains to Socrates the legend of the Ring of Gyges. Gyges, a real historical figure, was the king of Lydia from 716 to 678 B.C.E.; approximately 3 centuries before Socrates and Glaucon would have had their dialog (to clarify, Plato wrote the dialogues after Socrates' death and the extent to which they are based on real events is unclear).

It's a pessimistic view, yes, and Socrates probably has a better solution, but I'm inclined to believe Glaucon on the account of the ring of Gyges. Most people openly believe in justice for its own sake, but give them the power to commit any action without consequence, and I think the results would be very discouraging.

The Ring of Gyges is an ancient myth, passed on through the years, and kept alive by Plato. The story is that of a simple man, how during a storm in which the earth opened up, found a ring in the ground. This simple man put on the ring, and later found that if he turned the ring a certain way, he became invisible.
