Stories of the Battle of Britain 1940 – Death of the Defiant

The turret fighter was predicted by many before World War II to be the only effective way of dealing with the new threat of the heavy bomber. In the event, a two-man fighter with its armament concentrated in a power-operated turret did not turn out to be the answer. The Boulton Paul Defiant and the Blackburn Roc were only two examples of the concept to enter service and only the Defiant was ...

The Defiant was designed and built by Boulton Paul Aircraft as a "turret fighter", without any forward-firing guns, a concept also implemented by the Royal Navy's Blackburn Roc. In combat, the Defiant was found to be reasonably effective at its intended task of destroying bombers but was vulnerable to the Luftwaffe's more manoeuvrable, single-seat Messerschmitt Bf 109 fighters.

Boulton Paul Defiant - Wikipedia

The turret fighter was designed as a bomber destroyer in the era when the belief that bombers would get through in escorted and therefore need a special aircraft to destroy them. This book details the deployment and service history and it was not quite the disaster I imagined in daytime and the units deploying it had practiced being intercepted single seater fighters forming self protecting ...

Defiant to the Last, How an odd design refused to stop ...

Boulton-Paul Defiant was the third of British monoplane fighters ordered as part of the rearmament programme of the 1930s – the Hurricane and the Spitfire being the famous other two. Significantly, the Defiant was the only one of the trio which reached operational status only after the outbreak of war, and thus at the time of the Battle of Britain was still very much unproven.

The Turret Fighters Defiant And Roc

Most bombers of the period didn't have downward facing turrets, and it was thought that a fighter with a powered turret could get beneath the enemy formation and fire up. The Defiant, also, wasn't the only plane to take up this approach, during the First World War the Bristol F.2 saw some success, and in the 1930s the Hawker Demon biplane showed that the concept worked, at least in tests.
