Tri-band frequency selective surface with circular ring elements Abstract: A metallic ring has been proposed as the resonant element for a triband frequency selective surface (FSS). Dielectric substrate material with a high dielectric constant is employed to reduce the ring size and thus the element spacing for avoiding grating lobes at the highest frequency.

A novel tri-band frequency selective surface (FSS) is proposed by using multi-layer printed circuit boards with a number of via holes. Three separate propagation paths with two stepped-impedance resonators (SIRs) and a uniform-impedance resonator (UIR) are constructed in each unit cell of the proposed FSS, thus leading to tri-band bandpass performance.

A tri-band frequency selective surface (FSS) with close band spacing based on split ring slots for y-polarised incident waves is investigated. The close band response is obtained by reducing the strong mutual coupling between the closely packed concentric rings through splitting the ring slots and redistributing the location of the surface currents at resonances.

We demonstrate and optimize a tri-layer vertical coupler for a silicon nitride (Si₃N₄) multilayer platform operating at a 2 μm band. The large spacing between the topmost and bottommost layers of a gradient structure enables ultra-low crossing loss and interlayer crosstalk without affecting the efficiency interlayer transition. We achieve a 0.31 dB transition loss, ultra-low multi ...
