But archives are archives, so I packed my moisturizer and pieced together an outline from the archives. Mining prospects drew settlers from the Midwest and California who experimented with fruit-growing along the Front Range, but horticulture in a new landscape perched a mile high between mountains and plains was like a game of Tetris.

It's called Wisdom Sits in Places, and it was written by Keith Basso (1940-2013), an ethnographer-linguist. In 1959, he began spending time in the Apache village of Cibecue, in Arizona. He discovered a culture that had deep roots in the land, and a way of living that was far from insane. The Apache culture also had entrances to other realms.
